Jeffries would not venture a prediction on the number of rounds. He said he was going to light to win, whether it took ore round or twenty. Jeffries says the stronger, heavier, more rounded and more enduring man will always wear down the lighter, fraibr one, providing he is half way speek and game. It makes no difference how skillful and active the other man may be. This is meanning, of course, that the stronger man has a fair knowledge of seconds as well as some slow of speed and that conditions of health and feitle are about equal. When the lighter puglist these and cannot get away from his opposent, and is forced into frequent clinches with the consequent josting and infighting, the battle is bound to go against him. The wearing process gradually commences to tell on him and the josting affects the min in the rails of their respective weights.
